

A Legacy of Service at JPA

Rochelle Jackson recently celebrated 27 years at JPA. Rochelle has held several positions here, most notably Research Assistant and Coordinator for the Capella Project, a 20-year Longitudinal Study on Child Abuse and Neglect. Rochelle always talks about how much she loves working at JPA and how much it feels like a family, not just a job. Even though the programs have changed, she says, the mission has not. JPA still remains on the forefront of improving the lives of children and their families through social-emotional healing as well as educating parents, teachers and administrators on how to deal with vulnerable children traumatized by violence, neglect or abuse.

One of Rochelle's favorite hobbies is crochet. For the past three years, she has made hats and scarves for the winter months and donated them to charities in the Chicago area. Her dedication to JPA helps keep its historic mission alive. She looks forward to serving its children and families for years to come.

From all of us at JPA, thank you, Rochelle, for your service and commitment. You are an inspiration.
